- Brainstorming & Ideation
- Serving
- Trust-building
- Envisioning
- Connecting, Collaborating, Communicating

BISTEC Guiding Principles & Definitions

intentional reasons why an employee comes to the office are determined by the following principles:

- Brainstorming & Ideation
  - When employees are in the same room, generating new ideas and brainstorming creative solutions to problems can be easier. Face-to-face interactions can help stimulate creativity and inspire new ways of thinking.
- Serving
  - By being together, employees can share and empower each other by teaching other tools and resources to create a space where they learn, grow, and serve our local communities.
- Trust-Building
  - Building trust and strong collegial relationships is essential for effective teamwork and collaboration. Being physically present in the same space can help build trust and rapport between team members, leading to better communication and more productive working relationships.

BISTEC Guiding Principles & Definitions

- Envisioning
  - When employees are physically present in the same space, it can be easier to align on goals and envision a shared future for the organization. In-person meetings and workshops can help clarify objectives and create a shared sense of purpose.
- Connecting, Collaborating, Communicating
  - Being in an office environment can provide opportunities for employees to connect and socialize with each other, which can improve morale and foster a sense of community within the organization.
  - Emphasizing cross/unit department collaboration and connections when working in the office fosters a culture of teamwork and improves organizational performance.
